Conesville Launches Website - By Tim Knight For The Mountain Eagle Posted: Wednesday, November 5, 2014

CONESVILLE - Following the lead of neighboring municipalities, the town of Conesville has become the latest example of a Schoharie County governing body to modernize their information accessibility with a new independent website for residents, both current and potential alike, to serve as a local resource.

Started by a professional web designer who lives in town, the project was initiated to cover aspects of Conesville not featured on the county's main site. For instance, the new page includes business listings and tourist attractions, while the old site provides primarily government related documents.

Designed by Fred Ruckel, co-owner and operator of RuckSackNY with his wife Natasha, the website captures the all-American, Upstate country essence that is the rural township of Conesville, which currently maintains a population fewer than eight hundred citizens year-round.

Praising Ruckel's hard work and creativity, Conesville Supervisor Bill Federice told the Mountain Eagle that although the project is up and running, that they are, "encouraging local organizations and businesses in and around Conesville to contribute information about their events and anything else they would like to get out to the community and visitors."

Federice's township follows that of similar efforts in other area municipalities to move their information and resources into the twenty-first century. Both the Townships of Blenheim and Middleburgh have recently launched user-friendly websites in hopes of drawing more interest online.

Conesville, however, sits in unique company with Ruckel's extensive clientele in New York City, which includes such corporate giants as Kohl's and Chevron, in addition to other production related work.

The only difference is that for the small municipality, Ruckel volunteered his time and service for free.

Commenting that the website was well received by the Town Board, Federice believes it will, "be an asset to the Town of Conesville and southern Schoharie County." The website is located at conesvillenyny.com
